

Dating With the Marriage in Mind: the Quest for the Right Woman

Dating is relating. Whether you are casually involved or exclusively linked, the way you date successfully is to make a relationship. To build and grow a relationship is what dating is meant for.

A relationship may sound like a simple enough concept. There is you and there is someone else: when you date, you create something between the two of you. It may seem that thinking about a relationship means you are considering something serious and heavy. But relationships do not need to be involved or complicated, although they sometimes are. On the other hand, they don't have to be trivial or superficial, although they sometimes are. What you do in a relationship is to engage on some level with another person. And there are a lot of options for interaction, dating being just one of them, and with the right person. You can interact in many different ways and on many different terms but, in essence, when you interact with someone you get to know them a little better. You can do so over the telephone, by email, even the old-fashioned way, by letter. Pen pals from far away places have relationships that can often get to know each other well.

As you converse with others over insignificant things like homework assignments and cafeteria menus, you begin to get to know something about each other. As humans, besides the mere dating, we need other people in our lives to add a richness that we cannot achieve alone.

Everyone you meet, whether single or not, is different, even they appear on the surface to be pretty similar. The great thing about going to parties and other social gatherings is that it gives you to meet someone new and unique.

Dating as relating means to talk about ourselves and ask questions of the person you are with. The good news is that each of the challenges connected with a new meeting will become easier to overcome the more often you try and although it may sound strange, the first person you need to look at when you are about to build a new relationship is you.
